Written in collaboration with A. Lewis Licht (Dept. of Physics, UIC), with a Foreword by Brian G. Marsden (Harvard-Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics), this work is an interdisciplinary study embracing the fields of ancient history, the history of science in the West and in China, astronomy, and astrology. Part I demonstrates that Octavian (the future emperor Augustus) deserves the credit for founding the Roman festival in July known as the Ludi Victoriae Caesaris. Part II collects and examines the evidence from China and Rome that concerns the great daylight comet of 44 B.C. Based upon eyewitness accounts, a range of orbital parameters is calculated, and an explanation is offered for why the comet of 44 was not ultimately greeted as a baleful sign (as comets normally were) but came to be interpreted instead as a sign of Julius Caesar's apotheosis.

Collects, translates and analyzes Greek and Latin sources attesting 73 celestial events extending from 500 B.C. to A.D. 400. The analysis consists in determining the details of these sightings, their historical context, and identifying which are likely to have been comets (c. 51), as opposed to novas, meteors, or some other phenomenon (c.22), which are relegated to an appendix. A further 19 years are treated to which previous catalogues have assigned a comet but in which none in reality appeared. Where Chinese and Babylonian records help with dating or fleshing out the details of an apparition, this evidence is included and discussed. A 15 pp. analytical Index Locorum reveals both the coverage of individual sources as well as the terminology adopted.

BOOK CHAPTERS

1. "Senatorial Rhetoric," chapt. 10 in A Companion to Roman Rhetoric, ed. W. J. Dominik and J. C. R. Hall (Oxford: Blackwell, 2006), 122-35: Discusses the major differences that set a senatorial speech apart from forensic oratory. In particular, this study identifies and examines the ways in which Cicero adopted unique rhetorical strategies and styles in addressing his fellow senators (an audience of 200 – 400), as opposed to the Roman populace gathered en masse in public meetings (ranging in number up to 20,000 persons).

Stephan Heilen et al. (Olms, 2008), 351-63. Establishes a timetable for the activities of Caesar and the conspirators on the morning of 15 March, showing that the meeting of the senate was not summoned for sunrise, as is commonly assumed, but more likely for c. 8 A.M. Caesar's arrival at the meeting was delayed for c. 2 (not 4) hours.
